The Ancient Egyptian Calendar

Ancient societies were interested in the reckoning of time, and measuring the moon's cycle was the easiest way to do that. The lunar phases can be observed from a new moon until the waning crescent becomes invisible.

However, the ancient Egyptians, creative and pioneer as usual, employed a solar calendar, the first and most accurate calendar in the world, which is the origin of the Gregorian calendar used to this day. It was established in 2421 BC, in the city of the sun "Oun" (Heliopolis), a major city of ancient Egypt in the Predynastic periods, now located in the Arab Al-Hisn region.

The Egyptians were highly influenced by the Nile River and its flood, which determines the dates of cultivating. They linked the beginning of the flood with the appearance of the star Sirius (Sothis) and its conjunction with the sunrise. That was the first day of the year. Sometimes, they considered this star to be Isis, who brought the inundation. Crying over the death of her husband Osiris, her tears filled the river causing it to flood.

The year was divided into three seasons, corresponding to the agricultural cycle. The first is Akht, the flood season, the second is Peret, the planting or germination, and the third is Shemu, the harvest or summer. Each season consisted of four months of 30 days each, making the year 12 months, with a total of 360 days. Five days were added at the end of each year, which are the five days of Nasī, to make the year 365 days.

A quarter of a day should have been added to each year to avoid the calendar creep, but this was not done, which in turn led to a discrepancy or difference of one day every 4 years between the conjunction of the star Sirius with the sunrise and the arrival of the flood at the beginning of the actual new year. A correction of the ancient Egyptian calendar was introduced at the time of Ptolemy III, in 238 BC in Alexandria, by adding a day every four years to the five days of Nasī, which is known today as a leap year. This calendar is still used today in Egypt, being known as the Coptic calendar.
